

Aim - Design of user interface for the system using various interaction styles for given problem.

Theory -

Various interaction styles

- 1) Command line - The user types in commands for the program, usually one at a time. The program executes the commands and returns feedback if necessary. MS-DOS and UNIX use this style.
- 2) Question and Answer - The application asks question and when the user provide by answer all necessary data, the application gives the results. Sometimes, these are called walkthrough and use application.
- 3) Menus - Possible user actions are listed on the screen and the user can select one of them. Explorer is an example and most MS windows application also include menus.
- 4) Form filling - The user type the data in specific fields, similar to the fields on a paper fill in form.
Many office and database application use this style.
- 5) Functions keys - The interaction is done by a set of special keys or key combination for different operations, typical examples are computerized ticket machines, computer games etc.

b) Graphical Direct Manipulation -

Objects used in application are graphically represented on the screen and the user can manipulate them directly by pointing, clicking, dragging, typing etc. Most windowing system or GUIs are based on graphical direct manipulation.

There are some other interaction styles.

Eg- A lot of research is directed towards use of natural language as human computer interface.

Conclusion - User interface for the chosen problem statement was created using interaction style.
